

Fastech camber plate for $300

Posted by SvoChuck - 22 Oct 2008 04:30

short time only through a rennlist group buy .

=====

Re:Fastech camber plate for $300

Posted by joepaluch - 08 Nov 2008 20:58

I run the flat camber plates. I have done so for years. My ride height is limited by the rear more than the front. Running the rear any lower would cause the chassis to bottom. The trailing arm would hit the frame.. Heck on steel rear trailing arm cars you need to pull the rear rubber bumpstops since they will bottom on most cars causing scary handling.

So... going lower is not really possible and keep the balance. However we can create a simple rule to prevent crazyness.

The top of the camber plate can be no greater than xx inch off the top of the strut tower. I would just need some numbers to put in as I can't measure mine. The standard racer's edge ones should be the standard for this since they are run by guys that do run raised plates.

So give me some numbers and I will put in something about that.

=====

Re:Fastech camber plate for $300

Posted by Sterling Doc - 08 Nov 2008 22:47

joepaluch wrote:

I run the flat camber plates. I have done so for years. My ride height is limited by the rear more than the front. Running the rear any lower would cause the chassis to bottom. The trailing arm would hit the frame.. Heck on steel rear trailing arm cars you need to pull the rear rubber bumpstops since they will bottom on most cars causing scary handling.

So... going lower is not really possible and keep the balance. However we can create a simple rule to prevent crazyness.

The top of the camber plate can be no greater than xx inch off the top of the strut tower. I would just need some numbers to put in as I can't measure mine. The standard racer's edge ones should be the standard for this since they are run by guys that do run raised plates.

So give me some numbers and I will put in something about that.

Sounds good- we just need some numbers from someone who runs the Racer's Edge ones. Chuck?

=====

Re:Fastech camber plate for $300

Posted by SvoChuck - 09 Nov 2008 16:41

my car is in storage but I'm pretty sure it's same as stock...

=====